The teacher Rabião, sole heir to the philosopher Quincas Borba, on condition that he take care of the latter's dog as if it were a person, initially merely tolerates the animal.

In the first version of the Machadian novel Quincas Borba there is a scene in which the married philosopher Quincas Borba plays with his dog, which shares his name, kisses him on the forehead and calls him, affectionately, patrinha – 'shabby'. In the definitive version of the novel, however, what stands out are the blows the dog suffers at the hands of the teacher, often when it comes to him seeking affection. The hand that carries out the same one that strokes, the mouth that kisses is the same that resists, as in the verses of the Brazilian poet Augusto dos Anjos:

Quincas Borba the dog, without being considerate of his fair corner and despite the kicks and clouts that he receives, not only from the teacher but also from
